Bio

A physician–researcher–policy strategist focusing on public mental health, working conditions, and population-based prevention, aiming to translate rigorous research into strong policy. I study how society and human behaviour shape health outcomes—how social determinants such as unequal working and living conditions translate into health outcomes. My interest lie at the intersection of social epidemiology and social policy, with a particular focus on social determinants, public mental health, and occupational medicine. In practice, I focus on preventive approaches, including occupational medicine, clinical preventive medicine, and community medicine. I am committed to building a strong academic foundation, developing structured analytical skills, and gaining practical experience in health and social policy.
